“ I've been reading, each day during Lent, Daily reflections, actions and Prayers by Joseph F. Sica. It helps keep me focused on what's important when I start my day.

The one that hit home today was one about avoiding the "Shoulda, Woulda, Coulda Disease". The story is OPEN YOUR EYES and amazingly it is about a woman with Pancreatic Cancer

It was the day I found out that Elaine had lost her fight. Elaine a friend of mine from high school in New Jersey. I found out that she was living in Orlando near me several years ago. I reached out to Elaine on facebook to say Hi and we promised to get together for lunch "some day soon". Well, life got in the way and we never did get together. In January, I found out that she had been diagnosed with Stage IV Pancreatic Cancer and was receiving Chemo treatment at ORMC. I followed her progress thru the app that was shared by her family. I reached out offering to help with meal preparation during her journey, but never heard back so I assumed they had everything covered.

God has another angel. The sense of loss today is palpable. The loss for the family. The loss of missed opportunity to reach out and let an high school friend from long ago and a place miles away know she is special and my memories of her are wonderful and make me smile. I post this on facebook and received numerous messages from friend from school saddened by her passing and recounting the fond memories they had of her.

Life is short! Time on earth is limited. Take time each day to make a difference. Dear Jesus, open my eyes to who and what is most important each day. Amen Rest in peace Elaine.
